Dear Sir/Madam,

I have become aware of the ongoing need for additional university assistants for the C programming course and I would be interested in joining the team. My past experience with this course, the professor and the astonishingly helpful and involved roster of assistants that came together to create an amazing experience for the first year students, have ignited in me a great spirit of passion for the subject. I am well aware that this preparatory time is one of the most important parts of their journey through the programming world and it would be of great significance to me to guide them.

Even though I have not yet finished my studies, I feel like I qualify for this position based on my academic performance and proper skills in communication and team management. I have graduated the first year of university with high grades and have been granted a symbolic distinction for my merits in programming, in the form of a badge, from one of my professors. I perform well in any kind of academic setting and I am invested with great tolerance to stress. My public speaking abilities and those of elaborative nature on subjects in my field of study would prove of great benefit to the job.

Aside from the qualifications that stem from my academic performance, I have also gained quite an amount of experience from personal projects of mine. The various niches and problems that I have come into contact with have definitely expanded my portfolio and given me insight on subjects that span from low level assembly language to high level programs like virtual assistants.

It would bring me a tremendous amount of joy to be taken into consideration for the position and I would gladly participate in an interview in which I shall better display my skills and converse about our future opportunities. I am ever so grateful for your potential interest in a collaboration with me.

Best regards,
